Officially the Virginia League baseball season began yesterday, when Petersburg and Richmond sought to try the lid off and then fell short at the finish. It was a full nine-inning game, full in more ways than one, but it went to a 5 to 5 score, so that the announcement is in order that, while officially April 16 was set as the day when a percentage should have been gained in the column at the head of this story by one of the two clubs engaged in the contest, neither club has yet established its record. Ergo, officially the Virginia League season, so far as Petersburg and Richmond are concerned, will be opened over in Petersburg this afternoon, when Goobers and Colts clash for the second onslaught of the 1914 season, assuming, of course, that they can go to a decision after the second try.

From a purely critical standpoint, the game yesterday was bad, very bad. No game in which bunting was indulged in with such striking regularity with such persistent persistence as that of yesterday can be called good. The shivering throng that waited until it was all over must have enjoyed the postponing, for it was exciting, but the technician will tell you that it was bad, just as we have previously announced.

Both Petersburg and Richmond should have won and, as a penalty for their misdeeds, neither was able to break from the woe's out in front. The Goobers whistled six runs, the Colts five times, making a total of eleven, and the game struggled on from the eighth until the appointment lined the palls safely ten times, while Hyatt's young men struggled on in neglecting the horseshoe just seven times. That much is statistic. If there is any putting on the hand to be done to local fame, it is because the Goobers crawled from behind a three-run lead in the first stanza to the end of the fifth, only to lose the lead in the ninth, only to lose it again in the eighth.
